Oakland Women’s March

An energetic crowd of 100,000 gathered for the Oakland Women’s March on Sat., Jan. 21, according to Oakland police estimates, and Berkeley JACL members were there to support it. The two-mile march to Frank Ogawa plaza began near the Lake Merritt BART station, with brass bands, children, families and sign-waving protestors. At one point, BART trains were not stopping at the Lake Merritt station and an I-880 ramp was closed temporarily due to crowds.

Among the Nikkei seen that day were Tule Lake Committee member Satsuki Ina, Topaz survivors Toru Saito and Kiyoshi Ina, and Ros Tonai, executive director of the National Japanese American Historical Society in San Francisco. Berkeley JACL Board members Val Yasukochi, Jim Duff, Tiffany Ikeda and Nancy Ukai also marched.

75th Anniversary of Executive Order 9066

By Berkeley JACL

To honor the memory of the 1,300 Japanese Americans in Berkeley who were uprooted from their homes and businesses 75 years ago, we reprint here an essay by author Yoshiko Uchida, who grew up in Berkeley and was a student at Cal when the war broke out. Titled “Evacuation: The First Five Months,” it was published in November, 1966, in the California Monthly, by the California Alumni Association.

Feb. 19 is the 75th anniversary of the signing of Executive Order 9066 by President Franklin Roosevelt. This presidential order led to the unconstitutional mass removal and incarceration of 120,000 innocent men, women, and children of Japanese descent. Two-thirds were U.S. citizens. The immigrant generation, many of whom had been here for four decades, were unable to become naturalized citizens due to racial restrictions. That changed in 1952, with the McCarran-Walter Act.

Especially because of this history, Japanese Americans have a moral responsibility to work to ensure that Constitutional rights are protected for all.
